Trestle Stand Connecticut: Circa 1770-90

The original of this stand had a one-piece pine top with cleated ends and turned maple legs.

Tables such as this one are almost exclusively of New England design. Nowhere else in the world did tables such as this appear in such an abundance and variety. The leg turnings were popular, and each cabinetmaker reflected his artistic interpretation of the cyma scroll design in his work.

Early versions of this type of table could be completely taken apart for ease of storage or shipping. The legs were secured by pegged mortise-and-tenon joints, and the top was held on by pegs or dove-tail tenons.

The table we have adapted is considered a transitional piece since it was built late in the 18th Century; and while it incorporates many of the featues and styling of early designs, it was built to be a permanent piece of furniture for everyday use. It also is typical of the more common furniture of that era. Often we tend to think that all the colonial homes were furnished in the elegant styles of Chippendale, Hepplewhite, etc. But, in truth, the majority of the homes were furnished in basic, durable furnishings as typified by this table.
